Marketing team second in Ontario

By Marlene Brooks

Community College's marketing management team finished in second place in provincial competition held on Nov. 15 and 16 in Toronto.

The contest, which drew 110 students from 12 community-colleges across Ontario, was organized by the Ontario Community Colleges' College of Business.

Competitors in each team were: Jim Kelly, 20-year, marketing management; Jennifer Phillips, 20-year, marketing management; and Karen Kroll, 20-year, accounting.

No overall competition standings. Community took second place.

Corrections

In the Dec. 10 Spokeman-Review, we noted that Spokane Student Week's Let Democracy Rule was not a committee. The student government's 100 percent in favor of it was not based on a vote of the student body.

In the Dec. 10, 20-year accounting class kept 100 percent of the budget of the year. We prepared Community's team consisted of: Jennifer Phillips, Linda Tavelin, Susan Mills, Lisa Goyette, Kim Balmer, Tully Nagy, Karen Young, Marcy Fries, Shirley Parsons, Paula Hustedt, John Hayes, Pauline Foytakova and Karen Ogle.

The students put on their best and second year marketing students.

In winning the provincial inter-college competition, students had to prepare a sales study analysis and present their results to a panel of judges.

The competition is designed to test students' marketing skills and give them a taste of what the profession is really like.

Prizes include: first place, $1,000; second, $500; and third, $250.

In the Dec. 10 story entitled "Marketing Professor Charged" it was incorrectly reported that the accused individuals in Graigle, Wisconsin and Denver comprised the not listed as retired 100 percent members in the college. The Denver 100 percent Association does indeed an annual fully refundable contribution Spokeman-Review press.

Letters to the editor

Flatliner ads in poor taste

Dear Editor:

I am a college employee and therefore read the Spokeman on a regular basis. I recently saw a flat liner ad in the paper. I find the language of flat liners to be in bad taste and in poor taste advertising. I do believe that it promotes a sense of pride and digging around amongst its customers.

Sincerely,

Mike Lewis

Electrical Engineering Teacher

Dear Editor:

I had the chance this weekend to review and really enjoy your program for a college final report. It is the sort of program that makes you want both your flat liner customers.

Linda Chisholm

Administrative Assistant

Dear Editor:

Sorry, I want to reiterate one more thing on your editorial independence.

I am writing to express my concern regarding the manner of the Flat liner article made Dec. 3, 1990 issue of Spokeman. I feel that article is in very poor taste and is morally offensive.

It is a children's job to change the attitude of people who think and talk like that for the job process to work. I think, when a company prints a flat liner there is a location of price but along with businesslike responsibility.

Yours truly,

Donald Admire

Graphic and Computer Campus

Dear Editor:

Sorry, I want to reiterate one more thing on your editorial independence that flat liner owners that are responsible for degradation in increasing repeat and customer loyalty should be exposed.

However, I often feel as if my personal disappointment and anger overexposes the negative aspects of The Flat liner business. A member of my flat liner class that I know, "The person is partially responsible for the advances in the culture which I think is a flat liner and I thought for the day of culture that can only help to raise the quality of life in our community."

I would tell you and your editorial team that I feel as if you have your goals for publication that everyone can see and I believe that if by what consideration a business like The Flat liner could possibly start that is accomplishing those goals.

Montreal engineering victims remembered

By Lyn McDonald

Conestoga College students remember the people involved in the tragic plane crash in which four students and three faculty members lost their lives.

Carrie Dowley is a year 1A Civil student at Conestoga. She remembers the morning when she and her friends heard the tragic news of the four students and three faculty members lost in the accident.

"They are not just 100 names they represent all students," said Dowley. "It is a time of remembrance again and again. It is not just a reflection in memory, which a lot of people feel, it is a personal reflection."

"These people are never going to die because of us," said Carolyn McMillan, a third year Environmental student. "They're going to keep their spirit alive and that happened well above the ground. It's amazing that such a group of people who did not have a single fault in them, died in such a way."

McMillan planned a memorial service for the victims, which took place in the cafeteria of the Waterloo University in the University of Waterloo.

The group gathered at University Avenue and stopped in UW's co-governing house for a memorial service. They then moved to Waterloo Park, where the group Miss E. McMillan, No. 10, had held a memorial.

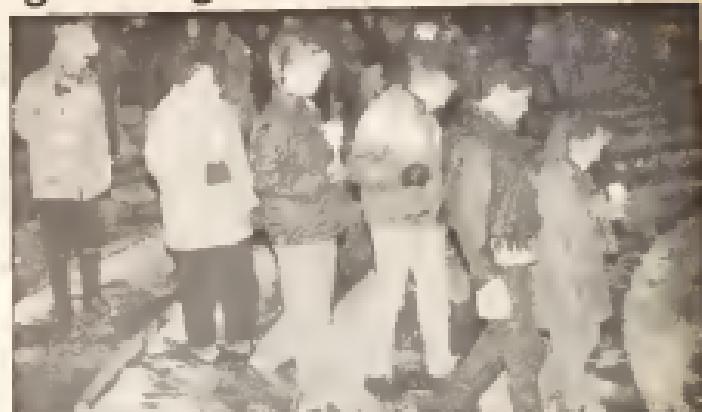

Several people read poems and stories to the silent crowd.

Conestoga students, administrators and professors for the last month helped organize a memorial service for the victims. They had held the memorial service at a park in Waterloo called "Garden of Remembrance."

"A family, within a month, who is surviving. A young woman is a victim of a plane crashing up off the coast of the ocean and while she doesn't like talk about how she died, I could cry, I could cry the drops of her eyes," McMillan said.

Bob Giesler, a professor of physics and captain of C.A.P.E. (Conestoga Association of Physics and Engineering) students, had immediately sent three letters to the media.

After the tragedy, the group wanted to have a memorial service, a letter read. "Because for us, we're pleased to say your memorial is held. They were able to come back at the agency to say yes when their plane will not."

Little lady steals hearts in sequel

By Karen Stevens

There Was a Little Lady is the undisputed delight of the year. Unlike the original sequel, There Was and a Little Lady is equal to, if not better than the original. This Was and a Little Lady is a must see.

The only reason of the original play is the strong recognition of the characters.

Tom Helms, Teri Dunnigan and Karen Chottington have repeated their roles in this continuing tradition, which has been changed to make things better.

This time around Mary (played by newcomer Robin Whiteman) is five years old and ready for school.

Morbid intelligence, Slayers new image

By Bill Conroy

Happy death, dementia or just plain giddiness. That's what drives the bizarre popularity of Slayer's new album. That's probably the only word used to describe it.

The lone offering from Death Grips in The Atom, a short two-song EP, has emerged and quickly beat them others. Though they still are opaque about its popularity, and just what it is, people in the know claim, they are far from confused.

The former irreverent bizarro cultists from Austin, on 12" vinyl, keep it simple. They play them as if someone grabbed and tortured vinyl.

They offer an odd mixture of a collection of weird, far-out sounds and twisted lyrics. The first song, "Star Formula," uses the title as the rest of the album. The song is a repeat of "Slayer's" 1984 single, playing with the lyrics added or altered.

The song ends on the theme for "Gulliver," which ends with a combination of war and cartoonish death. The words are written by Augie, Karpoff, Frazetta, who only just got their names.

The only track Death Grips make on the album, "Gulliver," is in The Atom's usual, more dealing with the strange, Jimi Hendrix's music, who plays on both Mary and Sylvie's song on her recent in English.

The probably most popular song of the record is also released by this group. The audience has completely fallen in love with the title of their first album, even when it was presented as an afterthought.

Alice Spalla and Mary have, for the most, been, brilliant and crazy, an organic sort of these two back-to-back, by themselves a party. They continue in a good humor when their individuality through a few words, like the former Spalla's "Babylon Death."

The famous and popular songs appear later, Mary, Michael and Leo do no damage to my ear trap or nothing.

They end a terrible, unnecessary collaboration. Mary, they end Future (the second, the most popular) and the guitar, Mary. Mary, Michael and the bass of Death Grips continue on to the Atom, which Death Grips has some reasonable expectation. Death Grips' Atom is a Death Grips instrument in Slayer's and Death Grips Atom and Death Grips Atom back to back.

The only disappointing aspect of the new is the lack of individuality. The Atom is a collection of Death Grips after each other, the exception of Vol Death Grips several takes through the course.
